Kanas Says De Blasio's Higher Taxes Won't Damage NYC
BLOOMBERG - Elizabeth Dexheimer
<http://www.bloomberg.com/news/2014-01-09/kanas-says-de-blasio-s-higher-taxes-won-t-damage-nyc.html>

New York City's richest residents may have to meet Mayor Bill De Blasio's demand for higher taxes to fund early-childhood education programs, said BankUnited (BKU) Inc. Chief Executive Officer John Kanas.

"If wealthy New Yorkers have to kick in a little bit of money so that young people can go to school early, so that their parents can go to work -- not so bad, right?" Kanas said today in an interview with Betty Liu on Bloomberg Television.

The new mayor has vowed to raise taxes on the wealthy to finance pre-kindergarten care, and Kanas said De Blasio, 52, will reach his goal in ways that don't "kill the golden goose" of the city's business community. "He will find his way to satisfy both sides," Kanas said.

De Blasio's five-year plan would generate $530 million annually by raising taxes on income above $500,000 a year to 4.4 percent from almost 3.9 percent. For the 27,300 city taxpayers earning $500,000 to $1 million, the average increase would be $973 a year, according to the Independent Budget Office, a municipal agency.

Kanas, 67, has run lenders in the New York region before including North Fork Bancorp and has opened branches of Florida-based BankUnited in Manhattan. Kanas, who received $3 million in salary and bonus for 2012, said his primary home is on Long Island. Residents of the suburban community aren't subject to the city's income tax.

Billionaire Backers

BankUnited is backed by billionaire investor Wilbur Ross and private-equity firm Blackstone Group LP, whose chairman, Steve Schwarzman, is also a billionaire.

The bank was among U.S. lenders that failed under previous managers during the housing-market collapse, prompting regulators to seize its operations and sell most of them in 2009 to a group of private-equity investors.

Kanas has been expanding Miami Lakes-based BankUnited after attempts to sell the firm failed to draw any bids that met the board's expectations. While the company is looking at takeovers of other firms, Kanas said he hasn't done any deals because of "lofty" valuations.

"We are interviewing and discussing with people every week, every day, any acquisition opportunity that might make sense for us," he said. "But so far our own performance outstrips anything that we could see."

Rejecting NYC's pre-K tax proposal could lead to statewide feud over taxes

DAILY NEWS - Kenneth Lovett

<http://www.nydailynews.com/new-york/rejecting-nyc-pre-k-tax-proposal-lead-tax-feud-article-1.1577330>

ALBANY — The co-leader of the state Senate is hinting that dozens of requests from municipalities could be in jeopardy if the Legislature rejects Mayor de Blasio's push to raise the city income tax on the wealthy to pay for a pre-K expansion.

Under what is known as a home rule process, a municipality requests permission from the state to raise certain local taxes or take other actions. Typically, lawmakers acquiesce to the locals and the requests sail through.

Over the past three years, 314 home rule bills were passed by the Legislature and signed into law by the governor, aides to Jeffrey Klein (D-Bronx) say.

"We cannot and must not have a double standard when it comes to home rule legislation like Mayor de Blasio's universal pre-K plan," Klein told the Daily News. "Either we empower cities and counties to set their own destiny, or we rethink this entire process."

Klein made his comments after Senate Republican Leader Dean Skelos said last week that de Blasio hasn't yet made a compelling case for a city income tax hike.

As co-leaders of the Senate, Klein and Skelos (R-Nassau County) each have the power to block legislation from coming to the floor for a vote.

The Senate passed 138 home rule messages last year alone. Rejecting de Blasio's plan — assuming as expected the City Council officially asks for it to be passed — could cause city lawmakers to retaliate by voting against other home rule actions sought by suburban and upstate communities — if they are allowed to reach the floor for a vote at all, insiders say.

In supporting de Blasio's plan, Klein said hiking the city income tax on those earning at least $500,000 will ensure a future funding stream for city prekindergarten programs and "will guarantee 50,000 4-year-olds the opportunity to enroll in this life changing program."

Told of Klein's comments, a Skelos spokesman said only that "we look forward to working with our partner,

Jeff Klein, on this issue."

Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver and his Democratic conference support the mayor's request for a tax hike, but Skelos and Gov. Cuomo have been cool to the idea.

Subject: CRAIN'S: Mayor vs. Governor

Mayor vs. Governor

CRAIN'S NY - Andrew J. Hawkins

<http://www.crainsnewyork.com/article/20140112/POLITICS/301129994>

Mayor Bill de Blasio wants to tax the rich. Gov. Andrew Cuomo wants to give them a tax cut. The mayor just won a landslide victory and has political capital to spend, while the governor enjoys broad popular support and is aiming for a historic re-election in November.

With the elements for a classic political fight in place, the two Democrats will need to reach a compromise on taxes between now and the April 1 state budget deadline. And Mr. Cuomo appears to have the upper hand:

The city depends on Albany for billions in state aid each year, as well as to set income-tax rates. With that leverage, Mr. Cuomo can pressure Mr. de Blasio to ease off his populist message and accept whatever can be squeezed out of the budget for universal prekindergarten, the mayor's signature campaign proposal.

"Mayor de Blasio won't be able to unilaterally raise taxes in New York City on high-income earners," said Heather Briccetti, president and CEO of the Business Council of New York State, which supports tax cuts proposed by Mr. Cuomo. "He'll need the agreement of the Legislature and the governor, which means he'll need some kind of deal if he wants to get that done. And I just don't see it happening."

But Mr. de Blasio has cards to play. Both Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver and state Senate co-leader Jeffrey Klein support the tax hike for pre-K, and the governor needs the votes they control to get his own agenda passed. Moreover, polls show pre-K is a hit with voters; the governor himself now wants it statewide.

Mr. de Blasio does have to fight the perception among the governor's inner circle that he wants to tax the rich not to fund pre-K but to free up city money to give unionized workers retroactive raises.

Contributing to this impression is the alignment of most of the city's unions behind Mr. de Blasio. Last Monday in Harlem, union chiefs representing teachers, hotel employees, health care aides and construction workers, among others, stood with the mayor to voice support for his tax plan. There was no mention of the pay raises that municipal unions expect from Mr. de Blasio.

Open for negotiation

Nor were details given on how the campaign for a pre-K tax would proceed, but Vincent Alvarez, president of the New York City Central Labor Council and the New York chapter of the AFL-CIO, didn't discount the possibility of withholding union endorsements from officials who oppose the tax hike, including Mr. Cuomo.

Two days later, the governor embraced universal pre-K in his State of the State speech but said nothing of the mayor's tax-the-rich scheme, nor of Mr. de Blasio himself. Mr. Cuomo's office said that protocol was followed, and Mr. de Blasio said he wasn't offended.

By voicing support for universal pre-K, Mr. Cuomo left daylight for negotiation with Mr. de Blasio and his legislative allies. A resolution would preserve the governor's reputation as a competent manager who ended Albany's dysfunction, an image important for his re-election bid and potential presidential campaign in 2016.

Mr. de Blasio may have even more at stake. Taxing the rich was a focus of his campaign, and it reinvigorated liberals, who have since made him their national poster child. Universal pre-K without the tax increase would mean average New Yorkers would pay for it, dimming the de Blasio star.

"If Cuomo stiffs him," said former Assemblyman Richard Brodsky, "I don't know how he gets through year one."

Mr. Brodsky, a senior fellow at public-policy institute Demos, said the fight on taxes will define the legislative session in Albany this spring.

"It looks like de Blasio has the Legislature with him," he said. "If that's the case, there are votes in both houses to do what he wants. Is Cuomo going to declare, 'I did my best'? It's possible. But it's not likely."

The governor has wriggled out of political boxes before. Two years ago, having pledged no tax increases but facing a budget deficit, Mr. Cuomo deftly passed off a $2 billion tax increase as a reduction by extending a "millionaire's tax" just before it expired while cutting middle-class tax rates. Last year, he and the Legislature quietly extended the surcharge on high earners through 2017. The governor has since been vocal about not revisiting income taxes, arguing that increases on the wealthy will send them fleeing to low-tax states.

Two-front battle

The tax debate will play out on two fronts. City and state officials will start hashing out their differences behind closed doors, with Mr. de Blasio likely to deploy his new budget director, Dean Fuleihan, who for years was Mr. Silver's chief policy adviser and knows Albany intimately.

Meanwhile, Mr. de Blasio, organized labor and the Working Families Party will take their tax-the-rich message to the public in districts of key state lawmakers to build momentum for their cause. The playbook will be familiar: rallies, door-knocking, phone-banking and possibly TV and radio ads.

The WFP recently joined with other left-leaning groups to create People for New York, modeled in part on a past adversary, the Committee to Save New York, a former business alliance that advertised in support of the governor's fiscally conservative agenda.

As one source who has worked on past campaigns with the Democratic-operative-turned-mayor put it, Mr. de Blasio "is a big believer in the outside game."

NYS Minority Lawmakers Seek Support For Mayor de Blasio's Universal Pre-Kindergarten Tax Plan

NY DAILY NEWS - Ken Lovett

<http://www.nydailynews.com/blogs/dailypolitics/2014/01/minority-lawmakers-seek-support-for-gov-de-blascos-prekindergarten-tax-plan>

Members of the influential Black, Hispanic and Puerto Rican caucus this morning sought to up pressure on state leaders to approve Mayor de Blasio's push for state permission for the city to increase the city's income tax on the wealthy to cover expanded prekindergarten programs.

Caucus Chairman Karim Camara (D-Brooklyn), different members of the caucus, and several other legislators--including a number of non-New York City lawmakers--held a press conference this morning on the issue in advance of an education rally in which organizers said more than 1,000 people will travel to Albany to call not only for de Blasio's plan, but an additional $1.9 billion more in statewide education aid.

"The purpose was to announce we have this coalition that includes members outside of New York City and we're asking the Senate to not block a home rule message that would allow New York City to raise the income tax on people making $500,000 to pay for prekindergarten programs, Camara told the Daily News afterward.

Camara said there was no discussion at this point of blocking home rule messages from other communities if the city's is rejected.

"We didn't get to the strategic questions," Camara said. "We just want it known that this is one of the highest priorities during this legislative session."

I reported yesterday that Senate co-Leader Jeffrey Klein (D-Bronx) hinted that other local requests could be blocked if the Senate doesn't act on the city's plan.

Senate GOP Leader Dean Skelos, who along with Klein can single-handedly block legislation from coming to the floor for a vote--said last week that de blasio has not made an adequate case for a local tax hike. Skelos said Gov. Cuomo plans to call for a phase-in of a statewide prekindergarten expansion in the 2014-15 budget proposal he will unveil next week.

Here's part of the release announcing the press conference:

"New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio has proposed a plan to extend and make available full-day Pre-kindergarten to all children in New York City. The new plan would close a gap of nearly 50,000 children who currently receive inadequate part-time Pre-kindergarten or no Pre-kindergarten at all. These high-quality education programs are proven to increase cognition, boost scores and build fundamental skills that put children on an upward educational path.

The Mayor has proposed funding the new plan by implementing a five-year increase in New York City income tax on earners over $500,000 from 3.876% to 4.41%. The increase would yield approximately 530 million dollars in new revenue for the City and make Universal Pre-kindergarten a reality for all of New York's families. The tax portion of the plan is critical to its success because funding commitments for these types of educational programs have not materialized in past years, leaving tens of thousands of New York City children behind.

Not only do full-day Pre-kindergarten and afterschool programs a help to improve graduation rates and to reduce the achievement gap, but they also make it 20% more likely that a child will graduate high school and will be able to work their way out of poverty. According to a recent study by the National Bureau of Economic Research, Pre-kindergarten programs can reduce the achievement gap by up to as much as 40%."

Hi Jen – wanted to offer you an exclusive on the next phase of the UPKNYC campaign to pass Mayor de Blasio's pre-k and after-school plan.

Starting tomorrow, the UPKNYC campaign will launch extensive online and grassroots campaign to recruit tens of thousands of UPK activists to mobilize as budget discussions heat up in Albany.

Tomorrow morning, hundreds of volunteers will be at subway stops in all five boroughs, handing out literature and signing up supporters. And dozens of organizations will email hundreds of thousands of New Yorkers, urging them to become UPK activists.

The campaign will include talking to New Yorkers at subway stops, at their doors, at house parties and at town halls throughout the City. Additionally, the campaign will rely on online organizing methods perfected on BDB's campaign for Mayor.

As budget discussion heat up, organizers will mobilize activists to reach out to elected officials throughout the state via in-district and Albany lobby visits, letters and phone calls. The goal is to make sure elected officials see that 70 percent of New Yorkers want to get this done now.

Let me know if you want this piece exclusively for a story to run tomorrow AM, and what you'd need to make it happen.

Thanks,

Emma

+ PR. My rec on background:

UPKNYC is an independent effort organized by civic, business, non-profit, labor leaders and prominent New Yorkers to support the Mayor's plan for pre-k and afterschool.

Similar to past Mayor's involvement in campaigns like Mayor's Against Illegal Guns, he is supportive of it and involved in helping to recruit supporters to the issue.

Subject: Exclusive for you on UPK campaign

Hi Jen – wanted to offer you an exclusive on the next phase of the UPKNYC campaign to pass Mayor de Blasio's pre-k and after-school plan.

Starting tomorrow, the UPKNYC campaign will launch extensive online and grassroots campaign to recruit tens of thousands of UPK activists to mobilize as budget discussions heat up in Albany.

Tomorrow morning, hundreds of volunteers will be at subway stops in all five boroughs, handing out literature and signing up supporters. And dozens of organizations will email hundreds of thousands of New Yorkers, urging them to become UPK activists.

The campaign will include talking to New Yorkers at subway stops, at their doors, at house parties and at town halls throughout the City. Additionally, the campaign will rely on online organizing methods perfected on BDB's campaign for Mayor.

As budget discussion heat up, organizers will mobilize activists to reach out to elected officials throughout the state via in-district and Albany lobby visits, letters and phone calls. The goal is to make sure elected officials see that 70 percent of New Yorkers want to get this done now.

Let me know if you want this piece exclusively for a story to run tomorrow AM, and what you'd need to make it happen.

Thanks,

Emma

"We applaud Governor Cuomo for making statewide universal pre-k a priority in his executive budget. But the money he is proposing is not enough for truly universal, full-day pre-k and the afterschool program Mayor de Blasio has proposed, and does not guarantee a dedicated funding stream at the level needed. In New York City, we need the tax plan that Mayor de Blasio has laid out in order to generate dedicated resources for a full and secure investment in both universal pre-k and after-school programs – and our city should have the authority to raise its own taxes to pay for the Mayor's critical expansion of these programs. We urge Governor Cuomo and the Legislature to pass Mayor de Blasio's plan to raise taxes on the wealthiest New Yorkers to expand pre-k and after-school programs," said the Campaign for Children (not approved)

"The Governor is right to recognize that pre-k and after school are an essential investment in New York's future. But unfortunately the budget he's presented makes it more clear than ever that without new dedicated revenue from a tax on the wealthiest New Yorkers, there is simply no way to make sure these programs reach all of our children," said Javier H. Valdes, Co-Executive Director of Make the Road New York.

"We're very encouraged to see that the Governor has prioritized pre-k and after-school programs in his budget, as we know that these programs are essential for the success of our children and working families. However, the funding he has presented is not enough to expand these programs to serve all children. We need the tax plan Mayor de Blasio has laid out in order to truly invest in our children's futures," said Melanie Hartzog, Executive Director of Children's Defense Fund New York. (not approved)

"We applaud Gov. Cuomo for putting Pre-K and after school front and center in the budget. Now, we must work together to make sure these programs truly reach all our children. To fulfill that promise, we need to find sufficient and stable resources – which we can achieve by giving NYC the ability raise revenue from the wealthiest New Yorkers as a stable funding mechanism for UPK," said Hector Figueroa, President of 32BJ SEIU.

"Governor Cuomo is right to make Pre-K and after school a central part of his budget, but the resources he has put forward are simply not enough to call his proposal 'universal.' Giving every four-year-old the high-quality early education that studies show to be so effective means finding new revenue, and the fairest way to do that is to give Mayor de Blasio the authority to ask the wealthiest New Yorkers to pay just a little more in taxes," said Camille Rivera, Executive Director of United NY.

"I applaud Governor Cuomo for recognizing the critical importance of universal pre-K and after-school programs for educational opportunity. He is right: we need the programs in NYC and statewide. But the statewide money he is proposing doesn't even meet the needs of New York City alone, much less the whole state. Therefore it's obvious that the Legislature and Governor should give New York City the leeway to raise its own taxes to ensure universal pre-K and after-school programs for all of New York's children. The importance and feasibility of such an agreement are now in clear view thanks to the Governor's commitment to these crucial programs," said Jeffrey Sachs, Director of the Earth Institute at Columbia University and Special Advisor to the UN Secretary-General.

"The Governor has made a first step, but what he has proposed will not come even close to true universal pre-k and after school for all New Yorkers. Albany has talked about fully funding pre-k again and again for 15 years, but without new tax revenue as Mayor de Blasio has proposed, there is simply no way to give our children the quality education they deserve," said Jonathan Westin, Executive Director of New York Communities for Change.

An Open Letter to Mayor Bill de Blasio:

We are Jewish residents of New York who read, in the leaked transcript of your private speech to a meeting of AIPAC leaders, the following:

"City Hall will always be open to AIPAC. When you need me to stand by you in Washington or anywhere, I will answer the call and I'll answer it happily 'cause that's my job."

We understand that the job of mayor of New York is a complex one that often calls for your participation on the international stage, and we would not presume to define your job for you. But we do know that the needs and concerns of many of your constituents--U.S. Jews like us among them--are not aligned with those of AIPAC, and that no, your job is not to do AIPAC's bidding when they call you to do so. AIPAC speaks for Israel's hard-line government and its right-wing supporters, and for them alone; it does not speak for us.

The daunting logistics of de Blasio's pre-K plan

By Eliza Shapiro

5:00 a.m. | Feb. 6, 2014

Getting Bill de Blasio's ambitious, politically tricky universal pre-kindergarten plan through Albany may turn out to be the easy part.

Because if and when it passes, the city will have to contend urgently with some questions it doesn't currently have the answers to, beginning with where all the newly eligible children will go, and how they'll get there.

De Blasio has said the city will have the space to house 53,604 pre-K students by this September and all 73,250 eligible children by the following school year if the city identifies 2,000 more classrooms.

"Make no mistake, we are ready to hit the ground running and launch a major expansion of quality pre-K for the coming school year," de Blasio said in a statement. "The real obstacle isn't space or personnel, it's the sustainable funding needed to serve every child."

But if the funding is secured, the space issue will pose a logistical challenge of historic proportions. The mayor's figures rely on a number of optimistic assumptions, beginning with the idea that the city will be able to identify and convert adequate space not just in school buildings, but in community-based organizations (CBOs) and libraries, all in time to accommodate the first phase of expanded pre-K in September. There are hundreds of city regulations to make classroom space useable for young children.

Another potential headache: School busing is not provided for most four-year-olds.

"I'm worried about it," said Pedro Noguera, a professor of education at NYU's Steinhardt School of Culture, Education and Human Development, about executing de Blasio's pre-K plan. "I just think if you try to do this too quickly you're not going to do it well."

"This could easily blow up in the mayor and chancellor's face," he added.

De Blasio and his allies are currently engaged in a political battle with Governor Andrew Cuomo, who has no intention of allowing a tax hike in his re-election year, and has effectively tried to preempt the de Blasio plan by proposing some statewide funding for pre-K that wouldn't require additional taxes.

That's left de Blasio to convince lawmakers and the public that Cuomo's proposal is insufficient to the needs of the city's children, even as he reassures them that his own plan is a workable one.

De Blasio offered some new details about his potentially transformative (and highly popular) plan in a report released on Jan. 27, which found the Department of Education has already identified about 4,000 classrooms that could house pre-K programs, with more space available in community-based organizations and public libraries.

The D.O.E. currently provides pre-K for about 59,000 children, according to the department's figures, with about 60 percent of the programs housed in C.B.O.s, and the remaining 40 percent in D.O.E. schools.

But many city schools are already overcrowded, meaning, presumably, there would be no room for new pre-K classes. (In Brooklyn's District 15, for example, where de Blasio's children attended school, 24 out of 36 schools are already over-utilized, according to a D.O.E report from the 2012-2013 school year.)

So accomodating the newly eligible children, at the very least, will require more resources and capability than the education department can muster on its own.

"There's hardly any community you go in that doesn't have a big need for pre-K," said Nancy Wackstein, the executive director of United Neighborhood Houses, a coalition of 38 community organizations, many of which currently provide pre-K and are willing to increase their capacity under the mayor's plan. "What it will require is all the city agencies pulling together to make it happen, and to expand in many cases. We in the nonprofit sector are sometimes the victim of slow city processes."

There is plenty of precedent for housing pre-K programs outside traditional schools: 500 C.B.O.s currently offer pre-K through D.O.E. contracts. But expanding them under strict city regulations won't be easy.

According to Department of Health regulations, C.B.O.s housing pre-K space must have, among other things, child-sized sinks with water temperature not exceeding 115 degrees Fahrenheit, 30 square feet of wall-to-wall space for each child, protective barriers installed in all stairways, and low banisters or handrails installed for small children, among many other regulations for construction.

C.B.O.s will also have to ensure that all rooms housing pre-K programs have the appropriate radiator covers and correct liquid soap dispensers for children, along with hundreds of other regulations for building and renovating pre-K space.

D.O.E. officials have asked principals and school leaders to tell them whether their schools have space for pre-K and if they are willing to host the program. Schools are also subject to regulations for pre-K: classrooms cannot be above the third floor, must provide at least 35 square feet of space per child, and have child-size bathrooms easily accessible from the classrooms.

If there are schools with pre-K space available, commutes may prove difficult due to a state law preventing children under four from riding a bus without a car seat. While special-education students will continue to receive busing from the D.O.E., busing for general education students is not yet on the table. De Blasio has also proposed looking into additional space in public library branches and New York City Housing Authority buildings.

Wackstein said that while some NYCHA buildings' community spaces are underutilized, some would require costly renovations in order to bring the rooms up to code for housing young children. As for the libraries, there could be space crunch: Pre-K children could end up using branches where schools chancellor Carmen Farina already has designs to create "teen rooms" for her new middle school improvement initiative.

Officials from the city's cash-strapped library system say they're up to the task of housing pre-K activity.

"We've been in the business of pre-K and children's literacy work for decades," said Anthony Marx, president and CEO of the New York Public Library.

The NYPL has 88 branches and most of them have floors or rooms for children, Marx added.

The Queens Public Library has submitted proposals to provide pre-K at several of its sites, a spokeswoman said.

Still, the details of whether pre-K programs would actually move into the libraries in large numbers or whether those programs would just use the libraries' resources have not yet been hammered out, sources say.

Specifics for space utilization in school buildings are still to be determined, D.O.E. spokesman Devon Puglia said.

"In terms of our classroom estimates, they are initial," said Puglia.

He said the city would find accommodations, without compromising on standards.

“We want kids in suitable spaces with high-quality programs, whether C.B.O. or public school, and they will be,” he said.

Hope all is well with you, and you are enjoying a respite from the relentless snow!

Are you involved at City Hall at all, or are you staying exclusively on the political side? If you have any involvement these days, I wanted to bring something to your attention.

I know that the Mayor values manufacturing jobs, as per campaign and other stated priorities, but I see that the only program that provides services to industrial businesses (Industrial Business Zone Program) has been cut completely out of the preliminary administrative budget. 0$ allocation. It's my guess that this is what the agencies themselves proposed to fund, but I think that defunding this program does not align well with his stated goal of using city resources to retain and grow manufacturing. Last year $1.1 million was allocated city wide after the Council stepped in to fund it. In contrast, NYC and Company was allocated $12 million for FY15. (Not that they don't deserve it—they do!)

Is there anyone at city hall that you think I should speak with to point this out? It is a funding decision that is misaligned with the Mayor's stated policy goals.

NYS Leaders Set To Give Mayor de Blasio $300M For Pre-K, Sources Say

BY KEN LOVETT

Gov. Cuomo and state lawmakers are zeroing in on a deal that would set aside $300 million for a full-day prekindergarten in New York City, the Daily News has learned.

Sources close to the talks say additional money would also be given to the city that can be used for after-school programs, though it wouldn't be specifically earmarked for that purpose.

All told, the sources said, the emerging budget deal would likely provide a total package close to what Mayor de Blasio has been seeking--though without the increase in the city income tax the mayor had been seeking to fund the expansion.

But, as with anything in the flow of budget talks, the sources warn no deal is set until the final budget is agreed upon.

Gov. Cuomo during an appearance Syracuse denied a final deal on pre-K has been reached, but said "we are getting closer to a number."

But he also referenced the $300 million figure for the city.

"New York City has been very aggressive in saying they want to move quickly and they would need about $300 million to bring it online," he said. "We'll have the money available, but the actual result is going to be up to the local governments."

He said how much the state sets aside won't matter if the localities can't get their programs up and running. Rather than hand over the money, a district will first have to spend it and then seek reimbursement from the state.

"I want to be in a position as a state that we can move as quickly as the local government can move--and then we'll find out how quickly the local governments can move," he said.

The emerging budget deal will also set aside additional money for full-day pre-K programs outside the city. But, sources said, that money will have more flexibility so districts can also use it to beef up full-day kindergarten programs.

In addition, it's expected that an education bond act that will go before voters will set aside money for pre-kindergarten classroom construction as well as additional space so the city can close down the trailers that house some classes.

Legislative leaders reported progress on the budget talks. Sources said a deal to delay the implementation of the Common Core education standards for two years has been agreed to.

One source said the major outstanding issues involve charter schools, an anti-corruption package, campaign finance reform and the DREAM Act.

Are you involved at City Hall at all, or are you staying exclusively on the political side? If you have any involvement these days, I wanted to bring something to your attention.

I know that the Mayor values manufacturing jobs, as per campaign and other stated priorities, but I see that the only program that provides services to industrial businesses (Industrial Business Zone Program) has been cut completely out of the preliminary administrative budget. 0$ allocation. It's my guess that this is what the agencies themselves proposed to fund, but I think that defunding this program does not align well with his stated goal of using city resources to retain and grow manufacturing. Last year $1.1 million was allocated city wide after the Council stepped in to fund it. In contrast, NYC and Company was allocated $12 million for FY15. (Not that they don't deserve it—they do!)

Is there anyone at city hall that you think I should speak with to point this out? It is a funding decision that is misaligned with the Mayor's stated policy goals.

Laura Santucci
Executive Director
Transition Team
Bill de Blasio 2013

Dear Ms. Santucci,

I am writing to ask that you consider me to serve as a board member of the Civilian Complaint Review Board.

[REDACTED] and believe that the CCRB can be a powerful tool for implementing Mayor-elect de Blasio's vision of a police department that respects the rights of all New Yorkers. [REDACTED] would make me an excellent member of the Civilian Complaint Review Board.

[REDACTED]

[REDACTED]

I also understand the mechanics of the agency and would implement needed internal reforms. The CCRB, for example, has seen a dramatic increase in its truncation rate—the rate at which cases are closed without an investigation. In 2001 this rate was 37.5%. It is now over 65%.

[REDACTED]

Although over the next four years the NYPD will be overseen by a federal monitor, the CCRB will play a critical role in police reforms. Once the monitor begins his work, he will be responsible for crafting a policy to end racial profiling. The CCRB will be responsible for enforcing that policy. People will know that the NYPD no longer tolerates racial profiling not when it circulates a new Interim Order, but when it takes corrective action against officers who stop people based on race. It will only be able to do so if the CCRB conducts detailed investigations that are thoroughly vetted by board members who are deeply versed in the legal framework governing law enforcement.

[REDACTED]

[REDACTED]

I remain deeply committed to issues regarding civil rights and racial justice.

[REDACTED] I would see serving on the CCRB as an a duty towards those who have been mistreated by law enforcement, and an opportunity to implement long-needed reforms. I believe that [REDACTED] [REDACTED], and my passion for civil justice would make me an outstanding member of the Civilian Complaint Review Board.

Sincerely,

[REDACTED]

The Pigeoning is a delightful, delicate & diminutive spectacle; a show created by an uber-talented pal named Robin Frohardt. I'm not sending this note to everyone - if you one of the folks getting this email it's because I think you'll really enjoy it. I sure as hell did. Consider this a hot tip, get your self a ticket & smile....
